final unit carries on the task that the second unit began. The spiritually transformative practices delineated as ascetical practices aimed at detachment (apatheia) require discernment in their application. What does it look like for asceticism to take form outside of an enclosed community and outside of the monastic garb? Are there methods by which spiritual practices enter the public sphere, and what might the ethical implications of such a transition be? Answering these questions and walking through these three units will provide a clearer understanding of what a life worth living has historically looked like, ways this life is believed to be embodied, and what it might look like instantiated in a modern context.
